Abstract

This work is aimed at assessing family resource management as a means of enhancing family stability. Some families have been successful in meeting their objectives and as such, maintain stable families or homes, while some others have not been lucky and have continued to experience family instability. The success or otherwise could be attributed to the manner family resources are being managed. For the purpose of this paper, family resources were limited to the human and economic resources in the family. The paper presented an overview of the family, types of family and then examined concepts of management and family stability. The paper went further to assess the factors that make for successful family resource management as a means to family stability. The implications of family resource management and family stability for human resource development were highlighted. Finally, conclusions were drawn and suggestions on the ways to help families manage and improve on their available resources for optimal family stability and human resource development were given.

A family to the Europeans includes just the nuclear family that comprises of father, mother and offspring, but the African concept of a family is extended beyond that. For Africans, the father, mother, offspring are merely a small portion of what the family really is. It is a smaller unit of the society. According to Ezeilo (1995), family is defined as a wider circle of members that comprises of the children, parents, grandparents, uncles, aunts, brothers, sisters and in-laws who may have their own children, and other relations. The family includes also the departed relatives, who are designated as the living dead.

The family is a natural institution, which exists throughout the world. It provides a base from which groups of persons start their journey into the world. Human family set up affects the way people think and act and Human beings spend the greatest part of their working lives in their families and the importance of the family cannot be dismissed with a wave of the hand. From time immemorial, the family has served as the primary institution responsible for raising children, providing food and shelter and satisfying people's need for love and support. The family is a social organization with a hierarchy of power based on the criteria of age, sex and kinship. Family, as a social organization requires provision and proper management of available resources for the maximum benefit of the family members (Efobi, 1986). In view of this, proper family resource management encourages meaningful and fulfilled living conditions of the family members who contribute to the development of the society. Such families derive maximum social, economic and cultural benefit from the society as they discharge their civic obligations.

Against this backdrop, Bass (1983) observed that the family has at least two clearly distinct co-resident domestic groups, namely the nuclear and the extended groups. Minuch in (1986) defined family from the structural theory when he saw it as a system comprising of units, elements or individuals standing in some consistent relationship to one another. Bui, Teachman, Milardo and Hyatt (2000), argued that the concept of the family has gone beyond the restrictive definition of being related by blood, marriage or legal means and living together as used by 1998 US census data. The authors further informed that between 1970 and 1998, households consisting of a married couple with at least one child living in the home decreased from 40 percent to below 26 percent. There was equally an increase in families headed by a single woman and other situations of non-related individuals living together.

In the face of globalization, family is not only group of persons united by the ties of marriage, blood or adoption consisting of single households, but includes people interacting and inter communicating with one another in their respective social roles of husband and wife, mother and father, brother and sister and thereby creating a common culture.

Types of Family

Anyakaha and Eluwa (1994) observed that there are different types of families and that each family carries out certain functions as a group whiles each family member assumes specific responsibilities. The most common family structure in many countries is the nuclear family which consists of the husband, wife and their children, and this can occur in a polygamous relationship. There is also the extended family comprising the husband, his wife/wives and their children, maternal and paternal relations. The consensual union involves couples living together but remained unmarried, the blended family results when a widowed or divorced partner remarries. In single parent families, there is only
Thus, in African context, the family is made up of people standing in some consistent relationship with one another (Nwoye, 1991). From indications what used to qualify as a family in the past may not be the same for a family in the present because of incessant global changes since other nuclear types of families, exist today. Generally, the incipient consisting of only the marital pair, the simple: consisting of the marital pair and their minor children, the attenuated consisting of one parent and minor children. In North America can be found among other types of families, marriage of the same sex, that is, homosexuals who may be both males or females and who see themselves as 'husband and wife' and actually live together as such (Jackson, 1997).

A family therefore is a group of a group consisting of two parents and their children living together as a unit. It is also a group of persons related by blood or marriage, the children of a person or couple as well as all the descendants of a common couple. Families normally live in homes. A home is a place where one lives permanently. The home can be a house or a flat. It is a place where family flourishes and from which it originates. Families make homes and homes keep the families together. The home is the primary contact point of families.

Management and Stability

Families all over the world need proper home management in order to be stable. This is because without good and proper home management, most families tend to collapse or experience chaos. Thus, stability connotes unshakable or steady state not likely to give way or overturn, and as such not detracting the family from its roles and goals. When applied to the family, stability does not necessarily suggest that all is well with the family. Instead the stable family is firmly fixed and not likely to change for worse. In a stable family there are no tensions whether internally generated by the couple or externally by the in-laws, friends, workplace or social circle outside the home that are capable of derailing the family off their course.

This situation according to Ekpe and Mamah (1997) depicts an ideal family where members are emotionally secured and free from overt or covert conflict with persons in their immediate environment. Okoh (1994) also believed that family stability is a product of stable union between a man and a woman. This means that when the union between the man and woman is unstable, marital instability sets in and the whole family stability is jeopardized. In his words, what make up family unit comprises of a number of consistent subsystems. Thus a family of six or more children will have:

1. Spouse - husband and/or wife
2. The parent - father and/or mother
3. The sibling - children
4. The brother - male
5. The sister - female
6. The older sibling(s)
7. The house helps (where they exist)
8. The younger sibling(s), and
9. The family in-law subsystems.

Inter and intra-relationship among these subsystems determines the stability of the family. For instance, Nwoye (1991) suggested that unsatisfying relationship, lack of consensus in decision making, handling finance, among others, cause instability in the spousal subsystems. This has a lot to do with resources available and proper home management since every family unit is usually composed of a number of consistent subsystems.

Family Resources Management

To be able to maintain proper family system, good management of the family resources must be applied and appropriately followed-up as and when due. The two major resources available to every family are the human resources and the economic resources. Family members require sound up-bringing in terms of moral and character training. This aspect of family life bears the family name and forms the strong foundation for building of other resources. The strength of the character influences reasonably the acquisition and utilization of other resources in the family. It is important to note that economic resources are employed to empower the human resource. The human resource aspect of the family requires certain things such as good food, clothing, shelter, love, medical care, education, etc. In order to satisfy these needs, the family uses other resources at her disposal such as money, energy, time, abilities and skills of members. It is a common understanding that individuals and families have many needs but the resources or means of satisfying these needs are always scarce or limited. It becomes expedient that we learn how to use our available resources wisely in order to build a stable family. The pertinent question that readily comes to mind here is how do we manage the scarce resources?

It is against this background that Druker (1996) defined management as a distinct process consisting of planning, organizing, evaluating and controlling performances to determine and accomplish the objectives by use of people and resources. In addition, Dressier (2005) stated that management is the process by which managers (families) creat, direct, maintain and operate purposive organizations through systematic coordinated and cooperative human effort. Osuala (2004) also saw management as a process in which various functions in conjunction with people and other resources are applied to achieve stated and purposive objectives of any degree. Thus, management deals with task, work and people, and operates within the web of human activities. Families must manage both human and material resources in a systematic and purposeful manner.

Finally, resource management is therefore, the process of using the family’s resources to meet the family’s needs or goals. It requires mental work and the physical power of the family members. Good management of the family resources will lead to the improvement of the quality of living within the family and happiness in the home. Bratton and Gold (1991) agreed that Family Resources Management unlocks the complexity of family decision making and so enables them to grasp both the-concepts and the underlying explanation of family behaviour. Indeed careful programming in family economies and resources management assists families and individuals to:

1. ensure economic security
2. maintain family stability
3. manage human and material resources and
4. increase consumer proficiency

But the question remains, how does family resource management enhance family stability? At this juncture, one has to look at various means of enhancing proper and stable family system in order to appreciate the importance of family resource management.

Means of Enhancing Family Stability

According to Anyakaoha and Eluwa (1994) family resource management involves four interrelated steps and these steps are sometimes referred to as components of home management. These steps include planning, organizing, implementing and evaluation.

a. Family Planning

This is the first and perhaps the most important function of family management and it involves the following:

1. Identifying the family’s needs that should be met, such as feeding, clothing, education, better housing, health and transportation.

2. Establishing priorities among needs i.e. placing them in order of importance.

3. Identifying the resources available to the family and deciding on those to be used in meeting the identified needs.
4. Deciding on how and when the resources will be used to meet the needs.

However, planning has to be comprehensive and rational such that intangibles are reduced to minimum. According to Obi (2008), effective planning has to do with the establishment of realistic goals. Thus, the plan can be short-term or long-term depending on the target or objective. Without proper family planning, there will be family instability and the target for family resources management cannot be achieved. It is worthy of note that when families experience instability, the society is affected. This situation does not augur well for human resource development.

b. Proper Family Organization

Proper family organization begets family stability which in turn, makes room for human resource development. In organizing the family for stability and development the following steps are have to be followed: arranging the activities within the plan in a logical order or sequence, and sharing responsibilities among family members. Organization involves establishing a harmonious relationship between the works to be performed, the resources needed and the combined workforce (family members), so that productivity will be at its best. Therefore, for proper organization of family task, allocation and adequate management of resources must be properly addressed to have a quality family with improved living condition, after all the family is the nucleus of the larger society. The proper management of the resources of each family means that the resources of the entire society are by and large properly regulated or controlled. In the same way human resource management begins at the family level and expands to the other human organizations. The advocacy here is building good resources at home and to have good human resources developed all over the world.

c. Adequate Implementation

This aspect of enhancing family stability involves the actual process of putting the plan into action, and ensuring that the activities are moving on in the desired direction. At this stage there is need for supervision of activities. It is also at this stage that necessary adjustments in the plan could be made. Here, evaluating the performance appropriately and applying corrective measures in order to meet the objectives of the family according to the laid down plan becomes imperative. In fact, harmonious relationship and good understanding go a long way in adjusting and readjusting plans at one time or the other. This helps to bring about successful resource management and family stability.

d. Effective Evaluation

This kind of evaluation involves the appraisal of the entire management procedure. At this stage one checks how effectively the family resources have been used in meeting the family goal. In agreement to this Anyakora and Eluwa (1994) advised that questions like: Has the family needs been met? If so, to what extent have they been met? What problems and mistakes have been encountered in the process of meeting the needs? How can the problems be solved or the mistakes prevented in future? There is need to appraise each of the steps of the management process and product.

Moreover, the problems encountered and mistakes made are assessed in order to learn from them and improve in future. Based on the evaluation, further planning, organization and implementation of future family activity can be influenced and better managed resulting in successful and stable family.

Adapted from: The Family Resource Management process (Anyakaoha and Eluwa, 2002)

Therefore, the steps or means through which family resources management enhances family stability are interrelated and indispensable to each other. In all these aforementioned steps, decision-making is paramount as it occupies a prominent place in making sure that family stability is enhanced. Decision-making is the action taken in selecting from alternative courses of action. It has to be in full operation in family resource management.

Decision-making is a mental process which occurs in all the four steps of the family resource management process. Therefore, decision-making is very important in so far as organizations or families would want to remain effective and stable.

Conclusion

Effective management of the family resources has remained one of the binding forces in family stability. In every organization, be it group or family setup, management comes first in the minds of every conscious 'man'. This is because when there is proper and adequate resource management in a given human organization; people experience common understanding and good human relationship devoid of misappropriation and confusion. Likewise, in every family cycle, stability is maintained when efficient and effective family resources are optimally managed. When in every family, individual needs are identified and every member is cared for in line with the family resources available, members begin to experience unprecedented family stability and real human resource development. It is worthy of note that human resources development is consequent upon family stability. A well grown personality from the family is a ready tool for human resource development and utilization. The family is the foundation upon which other structures of human society rest. This fact further makes more expedient the need for proper family resource management for the stability of the human resource and the development of the society.

Recommendations

The following recommendations are made:

1. Counsellors should counsel and encourage parents to engage in proper family management techniques of their resources.

2. Resource persons in family management should enlighten family members on the issues of resource management in order for them not to experience family instability.

3. Psychologists should as well promote family needs identification for proper planning and utilization of family resources in order to remain stable

4. Extension workers should not only include family resource management in their programmes but also ensure proper awareness and mobilization among families in form of seminars, workshops etc.

5. Educational institutions should include family resource management and family stability in their curriculum. This micro society which is the nucleus of the larger world should be carefully monitored in order to reduce conflicts and problems of the human society.

Abstract
There are different relationships that arise out of the workplace ranging from the individual worker and the employer to collective groups of workers like workers committees and trade unions and the employer or groups of employers. Such relationships are governed by labour laws that come in the form of Labour Act that would have been passed by the Parliament. The research looked at amended Labour Act No 7:2005 and how it impacted on the industrial relations at workplace. It also looked at what influenced the amendment of these provisions and whether they benefited the people they were supposed to benefit. It was established that the labour system is determined by a number of factors such as the ideology of ruling class, the socio-economic environment, politics and the balance of the class struggle.
Based on the findings on the impact of the new provisions on industrial relations, the research revealed that the legislature's intention in amending the provisions was influenced more by other factors such as political influence and the country's status regionally and internationally, as compared to the need to improve industrial relations at work place. What emerged strongly from the research was that labour laws are amended by the legislature with little consultation of the stake holders and as a result some of the provisions amended created more problems at work place than addressing them. It is therefore recommended that the legislature make intensive consultations prior to any amendment, so as to address problematic provisions in order to improve industrial relations and boost up moral among workers hence increasing productivity.

Labor law has been very important in guiding the contract of employment since 1901 when the Master's Servant Act was introduced. As labor law changes various scholars have been interested in defining rights of employers and employees and as such little attention was given to the impact of amending labor law on employment relationship. This study sought to evaluate how change was managed when Labor Act 7:2005 was amended and the impact it had on creating either a harmonious working relationship or a disharmonious relationship.

It is important to note that the ideology of the ruling class, the socio-economic environment, politics and the balance of class struggle all contribute to shape labor law at any given time.

Background

The first piece of legislation that governed labor was the Master and Servants Ordinance of 1901. Its main characteristics included the right of the employer to give penal sanctions for breach of contract and the right to fire. The employees had no rights. As a form of resistance the African workers engaged in disobedience actions conducted in "nooks and cronies of the day to day" work situation (Raftopolous, 1997). The difficult conditions which black workers underwent led the Wankje Colliery Strike 1912 and the Shamva Mine Strike of 1927 which attracted much attention from the authorities and the State enforced several measures which were as follows;

1. Industrial Conciliation Act Chap 233(No.10 of 1934) which laid the basis of collective bargaining and establishment and regulation of bargaining forums in which labor and capital had equal representation. The right to strike was recognized though with restrictions.

2. Workmen's Compensation Act Chapter 232 1932 and amended Act 31, 1925, Act 17, 1930 Act 19, 1936) Provided for a compulsory system for compensation where employers were obliged to pay compensation to workers or their surviving spouse if they are injured or killed at work. However it only catered for colooreds and people of European descent and not natives.

3. Industrial Conciliation Act 1945 which increased state interference in trade unions as a way of stopping formation of political parties.

5. Industrial Conciliation Act 1959 Act which now incorporated black workers in private sector excluding those in agriculture, domestic service, government employees. The Act banned prohibition of race-based trade unions, and suppressed militant television.

6. Factories and Workers Act 1951 provided state regulated enforced system of industrial safety for all employees excluding black workers in mining, farming and catering Industries.

The first black Labor Act to be introduced by the Zimbabwean government was the Employment Act 1980 which sought to redress the colonial legacy and dealt with the issue of wage discrimination, dismissal and minimum wages. This was followed by various amendments among which are Labor Relations Act 16/85, Labor Relations Amendment Act 17/2002 and Labor relations Act 7/2005. The political ideology by that time was socialist. The government wanted to introduce laws that would be away with racial discrimination and unfair labor practice by the white employers. This incorporated state regulation dismissals, direct state involvement in dispute settlement with creation of labor forums /courts like labor relations officers, and labor relations tribunal. On the other hand the state increased its interventions in labor disputes restricting the right to strike. During these amendments scholars have been more interested in focusing on the interpretation of provisions.

This Labor Act 7:2005 amendment was made on the basis of recommendation from International Labor Organization. The intention of the legislature was to democratize the workplace by bringing in certain provisions among the most pertinent are the following: The researcher was attracted by different ways in which stakeholders interpret some of the provisions in the recently amended Labor Act 2005 with particular reference to retrenchments laws which were now advocating for a fair dismissal. The interpretation of any labor provision has an impact in either creating a harmonious working environment which is normally characterized by peace, collaboration, meeting targets, and team working among other indicators. Misinterpretation of the same provision may have negative impact at workplace and this usually create a disharmonious relationship that is characterized by conflict, quarrels, high staff turnover, and increase in number of disciplinary hearings among other indicators.

Retrenchments section 12C of 7:2005 used to allow the Minister to make a decision within two weeks failure of which would mean the retrenchments would have been passed by the Minister. This was repealed because it was making retrenchments easy after the Ministry had failed to make a decision within two weeks, which implies that the employer may not proceed to retrench until such a decision has been finalized.
The International Labor Organization (ILO) defines retrenchment as "a fair dismissal" that must be for a valid reason which truly pertains to the operational requirements of the business; payment of severance allowances and benefits to affected employees and full consultation of workers representatives in any retrenchment exercise. The Government has shifted from the position where it controlled retrenchments to a position where, since the end of 1990, retrenchments have been negotiated between employers and employees. The intention was to give workers their rights, which go beyond the mere right to wages and notice, but encompassing the broad economic, social and psychological functions, which must be compensated on retrenchments. It was seen as super exploitation for employers to make vast profits while they pay workers small portion of the total value they create in the process of work. Fairness demands that when employment relationship ends due to no fault of the employee, the employee should at least be entitled to an adequate retrenchment package especially so as the years of service increase. The employer should pay some package resulting in a fairer balance of pains and gains (M Gwisai 2006). Since neither party is at fault, both should be involved in the retrenchment process and try to minimize as far as possible the adverse consequences. The legislature by amending the provision in 2005 wanted to make retrenchments easy if the Minister fails to make a decision within two weeks.

The other provision addressed by the paper is dispute handling where the new provision has now given Labour Court all the powers to handle dispute and cases are no longer referred to the High Court, instead they are now referred to the supreme court as the hierarchy will be shortened. The intention was to decentralize dispute handling by introducing workplace and industrial codes of conduct. According to Madhuku (1998), one of the criticisms that were made against the dispute settlement system in the Zimbabwe Labor Relations Act 1985 was that it took too long to be quick and effective at implementation. The system involved not less than six levels at which dispute could be resolved. In 1992 amendments were made to shorten the system of dispute settlement such that workplace disputes could be resolved within a short time.

According to Section 93, disputes are referred to the labor officer who will try to conciliate the parties. If conciliation is unsuccessful that is if disputing parties fail to come to an agreement within 30 days after the Labor Officer attempted to settle the dispute he/she shall issue a certificate of no settlement to the parties. The matter shall be referred to the Labor Court.

The Labor officer shall refer the dispute to the Senior Labor Officer who shall refer the dispute to compulsory arbitration. Compulsory arbitration is whereby the Minister on recommendation by the Senior President of the Labor Court appoints an arbitrator there are no charges on compulsory arbitration as the State bears all costs. Voluntary arbitration is only when both parties elect to that route and parties appoint their own arbitrator. The two parties pay costs of voluntary arbitration. The Arbitration Act Chapter 15:06 governs voluntary arbitration.

Section 97(1) of the Labor Act provides for any person who is aggrieved by the conduct of any proceedings in terms of a code of conduct or a determination made under a code, to appeal to the Labor Court. According to Section 92D Act 7:2005 a party which disagrees with a decision of the Labor Court can appeal to the Supreme Court but only on "question of law" not where the facts are disputed nor on the merits of the Labor Court (Markings, 2005). This implies that an appeal to the Supreme Court will be made if there is misinterpretation of the law and not on merits or dispute.

The introduction of the workplace and industrial codes of conducts was to bring labor laws into compliance with relevant international standards. The International Standards represent the fundamental rights necessary in any modern society to ensure social stability and economic progress. The reforms acknowledge economic and social dimension of globalization and the universality of certain labor rights while on the other hand they acknowledge economic and social interdependence of the various nations in the SADAC region (Gwisai M 2006).

It is believed that labour law can create significant value in improving industrial relations if there is wide consultation among stakeholders to establish the most pertinent issues that may sour relations at work. This, it is believed, would assist the legislature to address correct issues at work. According to Sounders et al (2000) the implementation of change in any organization can be problematic. This is especially likely to be the case in situations, where this type of change involves people and in which personal relationships and emotional responses are predominant” (McCalman & Paton, 1922:18.).

Mabey and Salman (1995) consider a number of perceptions about management of change that will affect reactions to it. Amongst these factors are whether change is perceived as "deviant" or "normal" and "threatening" or "desirable" Change regarded as deviant will be perceived as imposed and outside prevailing cultural norms. This is likely to generate resistance and this will require careful implementation to overcome the fear associated with this perception. Perceptions about the nature of change and the need for it will therefore affect reactions to it.

While it is inevitable that Law, including Labor Law will change in accordance with changing circumstances. How-ever, the main question to be answered is on whether the changes benefit the intended beneficiaries?
The researcher considered how stakeholders have been able to manage change of the new provisions of Labor Act 7:2005. The study used the planned change model that was developed by Bullock and Batten in 1993. (Mazhazha=Nyandoro Z F 1002 ZOU)

The model has four distinct phases which are exploration, planning, action phase and integration phase. At the stage of exploration the organization become aware of the felt-need for change. According to Cook et al (1997) there are six multiple forces that influence organizations to respond and adapt to change namely, technology, economic conditions, globalization, world politics, social and demographic changes as well as internal organizational problems. In its planning phase the organization must involve all people likely to be affected by the change. When all resources and the necessary support have been identified change is then implemented. There is need for continuous evaluation of activities that have been implemented. The last phase of the model is integration where there would be need to reinforce the new behaviors brought about by change.

In the first phase an organization explores and decides on whether vt want to make specific changes uv operations, systems or culture, hi this scenario the organization is the government who is also the legislature and employer on the other hand. At this stage the organization should create an awareness of the need for change. The Ministry of Public Service Labor and Social Welfare in particular had the mandate to identify facilitators for change to assist with planning and implementation of the change program.

The second stage is the planning phase. At this stage there is need to involve appropriate arrangements for managing change process. Intensive consultation to gather information in order to establish a correct diagnosis of the problems faced at workplace is carried out. Key decision makers are also consulted to give their support on proposed changes.

The third stage in the planned change model is the action phase. The stage involves the implementation of the changes. There was need for the legislature to establish appropriate arrangements to manage change process. The concerned Ministry had a task to evaluate the implementation activities and provide feedback for any necessary adjustments and refinements.

The last stage in this model is the integration phase. The focus here is reinforcing new behaviors through positive feedback and reward systems. The organization is to make a close up on the impact of the provisions and reward those stakeholders that would have successfully implemented the new provisions.
There are three options when designing change which are collaboration, consultation and communication. Collaboration occurs when members of a team work together through a change program. In this case the legislature and stakeholders should have collaborated in coming up with the new provisions so as to create the understanding of why change is needed. It is likely that such a background is necessary to build commitment in implementing change. Collaboration is also said to allow individuals with different experience and skills to become involved in the key change decisions. (Bourne M & Bourne P 2002-Change Management)

However collaboration at levels of policy making may take time to create and build the team and even if the team was to be build they may not be consensus on the best course of action hence the legislature in this case may become isolated from the rest of the stakeholders. (Bourne & Bourne 2002).

The other option in designing new provisions is consultation which occurs when work of an individual or group is presented to others for acceptance before it is implemented. This helps in creating understanding of why change is needed and alternative ideas maybe considered thus reducing resistance. However it should be noted that consultation may not mean that change will be accepted and it takes time to undertake especially with large groups of people such that in most cases consultation is done with small groups at high levels which may not give adequate representation. The last option in managing change is communication This occurs when people are informed of the change and have little or no say in what is happening.

It should be noted that each option has own advantages and drawbacks but what is more important is to ask "whom to involve, in what, when?. The question should be asked continually until the change is demonstrably complete and well embedded in the working practices and culture of the organizations.

Methodology

The researcher made use of qualitative survey method since the study was in depth examination of a unit of interest. Semi-structured and open-ended questionnaires together with interview guides were used in collecting primary data and documented evidence was used to complement the primary data, A sample size of 25% of the total companies in the commercial sector in Gweru was researched.

The researcher was focused on the managers were represented the employer, workers committees representing employees, Trade Unions representatives, Labour Officers, Head of National Employment Council and Labour Court officers. The total worker population for the sample size that was researched in Gweru Urban was 676 broken down as follows:

The second level comprised the people interviewed in each company. Purposive sampling was used at this level. According to David and Sutton (2004) purposive sampling is used when the subjects are selected according to the researchers own knowledge and opinion about which ones they think will be appropriate to the topic area. Thus the selection of the employer or employer's representative and workers committee member was based entirely on the researchers opinion of the most appropriate respondent. Furthermore the chosen respondents are defined authorities at workplace. Thus a total of 169 employers/employees representative's and members of the Workers Committee were targeted.

The study concluded that employment relationship at workplace got worse in some instances because of the way change has been handled by the legislature. It was further established that most of the intended beneficiaries were not consulted on the need for change, neither were there aware or able to interpret some of the amended provisions. As a result this constrained relations at work place hence it became the researcher's intention to focus on the impact of amending labor law on employment relations.

Empirical Approach

The data generated primarily through the use of questionnaires is analysed established empirical argument of various forms of dispute labor resolutions in Nigeria.

From the table above, out of 120 respondents on form of labour dispute settlement, 95 said yes that dispute resolution serves as a major form of resolution in industrial relation in the labour act while only 25 are of the opinion that it is retrenchment. Of the 160 responses 120 said yes that dispute resolution and retrenchment can serve as dispute resolution of labour act while 40 said No.

The test of statistic $X^2_{cal}$ (16.88) > $X^2_{cal}$ (3.84) showed that; There is significant relationship between the labour form of dispute settlement and labour act resolution.

$X^2_{cal}$ (16.88) > $X^2_{cal}$ (16.88) $X^2_{cal}$ showed that there is significant relationship between the labour form of dispute settlement and labour act resolution.

Discussion Dispute Resolution

80% of the stakeholders were aware that the amended Labour Act 7:2005 but very few (15%) had knowledge on which provisions were amended and the subsidiary provisions. On dispute handling both management and workers representatives concurred that most of their organizations fall under National Employment Council code of conduct hence they did not benefit from the National Act.

A Comparison with the South African Labour Act 66 of 1995

There is a Commission for Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration (CCMA) set up to resolve disputes. Employees contemplating a strike are compelled to refer their dispute or grievance to a council if the parties are in the sector. If not, they must refer the dispute to the Commission for CCMA. The Council or CCMA will attempt to settle the matter by conciliation. If conciliation fails they have to certify- that the dispute remains unresolved or extend the period for conciliation to lapse, from the date of referral of the dispute before the strikers embark on strike (See 64(a) (i) (ii)). In the event of a refusal to bargain, an advisory award must be obtained. (Department of Labour South Africa). Both scenarios have worked well in resolving disputes at work and there is little conflict in dispute handling.

Retrenchment

On retrenchments, 80% of managers' representatives felt that the legislature did not consider the employer's position during such economic difficulties. They expressed concern on the need for the legislature to consult them when amending such provisions that would affect the operations of the business. To them the intentions of the legislature were not clear. However 73% of workers felt that the legislature intention was to protect workers against unscrupulous employers who could hire and fire them at will.

Problems Faced in Interpreting Amended Provisions

On retrenchments management expressed that the provisions are clear but the process is too long. They felt that the provision does not give the employer room to express his/her need to reduce cost before retrenchment and as a result it forces employers to take workers on contract. Managers regarded it as an expense on their part as they felt that in most cases they will be stuck with unwanted baggage. They felt that the provision has a negative impact on their recruitment policies as they will be forced to take workers on contract. They also felt that they were not given enough platforms to highlight their reasons for wanting to retrench, In trying to avoid the long cumbersome process of retrenchment most employers have resorted to employing contract workers thereby creating job insecurity for workers.

The Principal Labor Officer and Designated Agents in Gweru urban indicated that the intention of the legislator was both political and to improve industrial relations. This is supported by Madhuku (2006) who argues that the intention of the legislator who is the Government and the employer on the other hand was to win the electorate by enacting Laws and Provisions that would make it stay in power for some time. The other intention was to be in line with SADC and ILO standards as Zimbabwe subscribes to most of their conventions. The Government would also want to improve industrial relations at work and reduce conflict so as to harmonize the society for a peaceful environment. However stakeholders are not clear on the intention of the legislature as they were not consulted on the need for change. They are also finding it difficult to appreciate the legislature's intention as some of the provisions have worsened their employment relationship for example the provision on retrenchment which has created conflict when the employer resorted to employ contract workers,

The Act is not clear on when the Minister should finalize on the decision to retrench. The Minister may take as much time as he/she want, if it takes long the employer would be stuck with employees who are no longer productive yet on the other hand he would need to cut costs. The provision has made termination difficult hence the employer would be forced to recruit on contract basis and there will be no job security on the part of employees. Workers on the other hand were not clear on procedures to negotiate for retrenchment due to lack of training. They also felt that the provision does not provide job security as most employers would opt for contract employees.

A Comparative Analysis with the South African Labour Act 66 of 1995

In South Africa Section 189 of the Labor Act provides that when an employer want to dismiss employees he should consult a workplace forum/ trade union/ or its representatives to come up with a collective agreement. It further alleges that the consulting parties must reach consensus on appropriate measures to avoid the dismissals, minimize the number of dismissals, change the timing of dismissals and mitigate the adverse effects of dismissal. They should also agree on the methods of selecting employees to be dismissed.

The Act goes on to say flat the employer should put in writing the reasons for proposed dismissals, alternatives and reasons for rejecting alternatives, number of employees to be affected by the dismissal, period dismissals are to take place and assistance he proposes to offer to employees. The employer according to the provision should consider and respond to the representations made by the consulting party and if the employer does not agree must state reasons for nor agreeing.

Finally the employer must select the employees to be dismissed according to selection criteria that have been agreed to by the consulting parties and if no criteria have been agreed on his criteria should be fair and objective. (Department of Labor South Africa).

The South African Act advocates for 1 month full salary for every year worked and this assist employees in calculating their packages while the Zimbabwean Labor Act has no guide lines until parties negotiate and reach a settlement (Department of Labor South Africa). This result in harmonizing employment relations as both parties will be involved in the process and there will be transparency in all procedures.

Conclusion

The findings revealed that small to medium commercial enterprises and even big companies were not aware of the challenges that led to the Amendment of Labor Act 7:2005. In the literature reviewed various authors agreed that any new regulations can be welcomed with different reactions which bring the issue of managing change at work. It has been further established that organizations in Commercial Sector need to be involved during policy formulation for them to appreciate and understand any changes in labor regulations. Stakeholders seem to understand their codes of conduct in respect of their dispute settlement. The Ministry of Public Service Labor and Social Welfare has no guidelines on packages which should be given during retrenchment.

Recommendations

1. Ministerial powers should be clarified and employers should be given room to explain their predicament that will be forcing them to retrench.

2. The Ministry of Public Service Labor and Social Welfare should have a branch which should be responsible for consulting, training and implementing any new amendments so that stakeholders are able to interpret and implement the new provisions.

3. There is need for the legislature to make extensive consultation before coming as with an Act. Consultations should be done through Trade Unions and employer organizations. It is recommended that further studies be done on a national basis for the Commercial Sector to ascertain the impact of the amended Labor Act 2005 provisions on labor relations at national level.
